Europe wants to progress united Yannis Xenakis (European Commission- former Head of Unit)

This lecture argues that, despite populist criticism, doubts about Europe's future, and challenges to its values, the people of Europe aspire to progress united in the pursuit of peace and prosperity. The lecture will delve into Europe's major economic achievements, such as the internal market, a single currency, solidarity mechanisms to cope with crises and world leadership in the effort to save the planet. This progress has been strengthening Europe's standing in the world. It also renders it more attractive to potential candidates. Reform of the Union's decision-making process, compromises among Member States, as well as ampler financial means, are necessary for broadening the Union, further raising its international profile and successfully contributing to the action for climate and environment. This lecture will be held online, and simultaneously live-streamed in Room 302 in Building 22 at Hochschule Fulda.
